THE CHECKLIST

7 Customer Journey Gaps Costing Businesses Revenue

Most businesses don’t have a traffic problem — they have a customer journey problem. These are the seven gaps where revenue quietly leaks out after the click, and a quick check for each.

01

No welcome flow

A subscriber or first-time buyer is never more engaged than right after they opt in — yet most brands send nothing, or a single generic receipt. The first 48 hours set the tone for the entire relationship.

QUICK CHECK Do new contacts get a 3–5 email welcome sequence that sets expectations and makes a clear first (or repeat) offer?

02

A silent post-purchase experience

After the sale, communication usually stops — no onboarding, no “how to get the most from it,” no reassurance. Buyers disengage, and a one-time sale never becomes a second one.

QUICK CHECK Does every purchase trigger a post-purchase sequence (thank you, how-to, what’s next)?

03

No abandoned-checkout or browse recovery

Most people who add to cart or browse a key page don’t buy on the first visit. With no reminder, that intent — and the revenue attached to it — is simply lost.

QUICK CHECK Are abandoned-cart and browse-abandonment reminders live, and are you measuring what they recover?

04

Treating every customer the same

Blasting one message to your whole list ignores where each person is in their journey. New leads, loyal buyers, and lapsed customers all need different messages.

QUICK CHECK Is your audience segmented by behavior and lifecycle stage — not just one big list?

05

No replenishment or repeat-purchase prompts

For consumable or recurring products, customers run out and forget to reorder. Without a timely, well-timed nudge, they quietly drift to a competitor.

QUICK CHECK Do you remind customers to repurchase at the right interval for your product?

06

Ignoring at-risk and lapsed customers

Winning a new customer costs far more than keeping one. Yet customers who haven't bought in a while are usually left to churn in silence.

QUICK CHECK Is there a winback flow for customers who've gone quiet — before they're gone for good?

07

Flying blind on retention

If you only measure acquisition (traffic, CPC, conversion rate), you can't see the leaks after the sale. Retention and lifetime value are where durable, compounding growth actually lives.

QUICK CHECK Do you track repeat-purchase rate, retention, and customer lifetime value — not just first-order metrics?

Found a few gaps?

That's where the revenue is. ReeCo helps businesses map the full customer journey, close the leaks, and build systems that turn first-time buyers into long-term customers. For more strategy on customer journeys, retention, and growth, join the ReeCo newsletter.
